

Jordan Gruchala

Overview

- In recent years, the post-Cold War order of high globalization and interconnection has been evolving back into a traditional great-power competition world order.
- No longer do stateless actors pose the main threat to international security.
- Especially given Russia's full-scale invasion of Ukraine, how are Europeans responding to this changing world order?

Central Findings

- Europeans of all nationalities perceive the security of their nation as under threat.
- The most insecure nationalities are not bordering aggressive countries, suggesting different dynamics at play.

Data set

- Eurobarometer survey, created February 11, 2026
- "Flash Eurobarometer FL574: The European Union in Defence and Space"
- Survey data on citizens from member EU states
- Citation :
European Commission, Directorate-General for Communication, "Flash Eurobarometer FL574: The European Union in Defence and Space", version v1.00, 2026, accessed 2026-04-20, http://data.europa.eu/88u/dataset/c39552_f574_eng

Core Measures

- Core measures used for project :
 - Q: Given the current international context, to what extent do you agree or disagree with the statement? The security of YOUR COUNTRY is threatened.
 - A: Strongly agree
 - Somewhat agree
 - Somewhat disagree
 - Strongly disagree
 - Don't know
- Demographic information on respondents age, gender, and region.

Total 'agrees'

-in all but one EU member country, half or more of respondents at least somewhat agree their nation is under threat.

Eastern European countries perception of threat

Proportion of respondents who either "strongly agree" or "somewhat agree" in countries bordering Russia

Who Feels the Most at Risk in the Evolving International Order?

Jordan Gruchala

Overview

- In recent years, the post-Cold War order of high globalization and interconnection has been evolving back into a traditional great power competition world order.